

Countries similar... good bad?

Countries are becoming more and more similar because people are able to buy the same products anywhere in the world. Do you think this is a positive or negative development?

People nowadays can purchase the same consumer goods all around the world, and this causes countries to have more similar identities. Some might say/argue/claim that similar-nearly identical products available in different areas/regions is a positive development as global trade can increase productivity along with specialisation. However, I think it is a negative development on the whole due to the potential loss of unique cultures.

Comment [Dave1]: clear intro, a little long but ok – good vocabulary – clear opinion

If people-residents/citizens/the general public around the world consume similar products, countries might lack their original identities and possibly losing their traditions entirely this can erode traditional cultural identities. The products each-and every one-of-us-individual consumes every day shows/communicates our taste, hobbies and preferences to sellers and corporations. Buying similar products could be understood as the consumers from different countries having similar choices in what they consume. This is threatening to local cultures as some of the traditional products are not favoured by the buyers anymore. Using an-the example of the music industry, suppose that more-and more listeners are buying-increasing numbers of the general public are interested in western pop music and artists such as Michael Jackson's records, less people would buy traditional Chinese records and others dominate the charts. In countries such as China, this means less interest in traditional music and after generations, the rudimentary-more rustic Chinese musical culture might be dismissed-in exchange for the latest pop songs-relegated to a niche genre.

Comment [Dave2]: shorter and simpler topic sentence

Comment [Dave3]: a little more specific what is happening when you show your taste to a company

Comment [Dave4]: repetitive – same thing as before

Comment [Dave5]: don't be too repetitive – try to get to your example faster and then you have more time to develop your example

Comment [Dave6]: random to mention china here

Comment [Dave7]: be careful slowly introducing the example of china

Comment [Dave8]: good example – very specific about china

More-There are economical problems arising from this situation other than-beyond the cultural threats. Global-super powers like the United States and China are dominating the world in terms of flooding the market with their products-consumer market. A lot of the times, the consumers from weaker-less developed/advanced economies have no choice but to buy their products. This forms a monopoly or oligopoly that sets high barriers of entry to the market, and makes joining-a-market-competition harder for sunrise-burgeoning companies and small businesses-industries. To-explain-One hypothetical example of this would be that it would be, it is-nearly impossible for a new mobile phone brand from a nation such as South-Sub-Saharan Africa or Latin America to compete with tech giants like Apple or Huawei. Even if the new brand is superior in all aspects to its counterpart, brand loyalty and the ability to undercut competitors by-to these tech-giants would still make them the preferred choice.

Comment [Dave9]: really high level vocabulary and ideas

Comment [Dave10]: charge less money – lost money

Comment [Dave11]: excellent examples – really strong!

In conclusion, the loss of cultural identities and high barriers of-to entry in the economic marketplace makes the possibility-reality of buying the same products anywhere in the world a negative development overall. I think that global/political country-leaders should be aware of their own unique cultural uniques-heritages and protect them from foreign influences. Also-Moreover, the-market regulators should do-their-jobs-proactive in protecting

Comment [Dave12]: a little informal

~~vulnerable sunrise industries in order for them to find their own~~ establish a place in ~~the a competitive economic landscapemarket.~~

Comment [Dave13]: really strong ideas and vocabulary – great!

368

Task achievement: 8

Cohesion/Coherence: 7 – paraphrasing, referencing, topic sentences, substitution

Vocabulary: 7/8 – a few too many mistakes and informal expressions

Grammar: 7 – really good complexity but you should focus on accuracy – modal verbs, punctuation, articles, prepositions, subordinate clause constructions a little informal at times

Overall: 7/7.5